Stress-induced gastric ulcers are an experimental model of upper gastrointestinal ulceration in which 100 per cent of animals undergo ulceration when stressed. The present study was undertaken to elucidate the effect of various physiological factors on this process. It was found that the onset of ulceration was significantly delayed by cimetidine administration, was accelerated by vagotomy and significantly increased by pyloric ligation. No significant effect was observed on the healing process of ulcers. No significant difference in the ulcer-healing rate of either

sex was observed. 82157476af
