This past weekend has been really busy. One of my team's members was taken into the hospital with an emergency blood clot in her leg. It's happened before, but this time they were more careful. What they didn't catch was that her Fibromyalgia was playing havoc on her immune system. Being such a heavy smoker, she also had a slight ulcer on her lung. It was like she was fighting a war with a few of her own body parts. Her kidneys were kind enough to let her know that they weren't going to take any more from her. She finally checked into the hospital and was put on dialysis to help clear her blood, as well as the EKG, which showed an irregular heartbeat. She was placed in the ICU for monitoring until her kidneys cleared up. They finally put a central line in her, so she could have liquids and blood. Once that was set up, they settled in and the nurses monitored her closely for several days. Her blood pressure, kidney function, heart, and heart rate were all very good when they got her out of the ICU. On Monday she was sent back to the floor and someone from the unit called and said that the doctors said that her kidney would get back to normal in a few days and the blockage in her leg was gone. So off she went, back to her room with TV and no visitors. On Tuesday her doctor called and said that he was going to discharge her. But he said that she had to wait a few days and see how her blood did. Tuesday night, her heart started racing like crazy. They called it "activation syndrome" because there was a huge increase in activity of the heart. They didn't know what was wrong. Her doctor, who was still at the hospital, knew what was going on. He immediately brought her back to the hospital and started her on a drug that increases the production of red blood cells. Then on Wednesday, one of the nurses at the hospital called and said that she had an irregular heartbeat. They put her back on dialysis, but the hospital called the poison control center and said that since it was just her kidneys that they were treating, they were safe to increase the amounts of fluids in her body
