The announcement comes after the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) and two other groups, on behalf of comedian Trevor Noah, threatened to file a lawsuit over a skit performed last week by the show that portrayed the NRA as having "full-on racist, sexist, gun-loving white people." "We thought the advocacy was funny. We still do," Stewart said of the skit, according to the Huffington Post. "It's just that we would not have dreamed of doing it without your permission." ADVERTISEMENT "We think the NRA works so hard on its public image that we thought it was only fair to cut them some slack," Stewart added. ACLU Executive Director Anthony D. Romero blasted the NRA's decision to pull advertising from the show. "We will not allow a corporate gun lobby to dictate what jokes are funny or what comedy writers can express on television. The NRA is a group of bullies and cowards," Romero said in a statement. In the Huffington Post interview, Stewart also said he hoped to go on an NRA-free media tour. "I was able to convince them that they could have a relationship with me and I could come on their platform, they would not have to fear that I would go on a rampage and shoot up their headquarters. 2d92ce491b
