alumniOTTAWA — Prime Minister Stephen Harper’s troubled trip to Russia to attend the G20 summit became more interesting as the final day of the gathering drew near. It wasn’t until the last day that Harper made the trip to Kaliningrad, the small Russian enclave between Poland and Lithuania, a region once part of the Soviet Union.
It seems to have been the only part of the trip he was ever interested in. Why? Because he couldn’t make it to the G20 in Singapore without being there. He made that clear in an interview with CBC’s Peter Mansbridge, who asked him point-blank why he had spent his last day in Moscow visiting the region. “I had to be there,” Harper said. Never mind that it took Harper three hours to make the 10-kilometre trip to Kaliningrad, by a combination of train, boat and car. (It would have taken him just over an hour by car.) Harper didn't make it to Singapore, but his government was still there. Harper didn't say whether his flight home from Moscow was canceled because of the weather, but it certainly didn't matter. Had the travel been easy, the last day of the G20 would have made for a rather less interesting story. But because it was so damn hard, the last day of the summit became downright riveting. It wasn't the first time Harper was late to a meeting. But it was the first time he was late for a meeting so critical to his own government's survival. He was scheduled to meet with his cabinet Monday morning. By 7:15 a.m. the morning after, the government had not received any news. At 7:30 a.m. or so, the media was alerted that he would not be in attendance. By 9 a.m. cabinet ministers were up and running. Finance Minister Jim Flaherty and International Trade 4bc0debe42
